Julia meets Winston

Winston was worried that Julia was a member of the Thought Police as she was constantly following him. However, she reveals to him that she loves him. Together, they rebel against the Party in anyway they can.

Winston and Julia meet at O'Brien's house. This is the first time in the story where we see the telescreen turned off. He informs that he is a member of the Brotherhood. Together, Winston and Julia admit that they are enemies of the Party. O'Brien explains to them how the Brotherhood operates and what it means to be part of the Brotherhood.

Meeting with O'Brien

Caught above Mr. Charrington's

Winston and Julia are in the room above Mr. Charrington's shop. It is then revealed that there was a telescreen in the room the entire time they have been having their affair in that room and discussing their thoughtcrimes. Not only was there a telescreen, but Mr. Charrington himself was revealed to be a member of the Thought Police. This was the beginning of the end for Winston and Julia's rebellious ways.

In the Ministry of Love, O'Brien reveals that he is actually a member of the Thought Police. He says that he has been watching Winston for several years. He proceeds to torture Winston, in order to "rehabilitate" him to become a model Party member.
